

ideas

Transcribed by TurboScribe. Go Unlimited to remove this message.

I think that every single character that you can choose from has to have one of five different backgrounds that they have dealt with throughout their life. I think that a small cinematic is definitely needed for the character that you choose, so it can be a little bit of text or it can be maybe like an unspoken story, so it shows you the events that happen. I think that it would add a lot more character and depth to the characters that you choose, especially because when you choose them you can just go straight into the story.

I think that every character should have a different place that they come from and starting zone. I think that it would be a good idea to maybe start a story and a character is working for a blacksmith and he's learned the trades as a blacksmith man, but a group of orcs or something of that matter come and attack the town and your character has to deal with grief because the blacksmith that has been training him his whole life has now died. So I think it'd be really cool to have maybe that hatred or that that anger towards different species that has interacted with the character.

Also I think that characters can be on the grid scale of lawfully good, lawfully evil, lawfully neutral, chaotic neutral, chaotic chaotic. They have different personalities and I don't think every character should be the same. I think it should be very interesting to have characters that maybe don't get along in the party or maybe characters get on very good in the party because they work well together.

Transcribed by TurboScribe. Go Unlimited to remove this message.